

India deserves to be called the land of the superlative. In it are the greatest monuments of architecture, the finest specimens of marble carving and polishing, the most wonderful and valuable collections of jewels, the most beautiful textures and colors, the finest weaves and embroideries, the most abject poverty, the greatest fifth, the most beautiful structures in the whole the most beautiful tombs, the most commonplace scenery and the grandest sights in the mountain regions. Here are the greatest number of religious sects and the greatest ignorance.

The poorest cooles put their savings into brass, copper, silver or gold hammered rings, bracetets, necklaces and girdles. They wear them constantly, and it is not ancommon to see scores of women carrying baskets of mentary to Mr. and Mrs. Roy Bradley merchandise or much on their heads, or hammering rocks by the roadside, Wheeler, who are spending their merchandise or muck on their heads, or hammering rocks by the roadside, each loaded with silver anklets—toe rings, nose and ear rings and bracelets on both arms reaching from her wrists to her elbows. This is her wealth. In time of famins it can be converted into food piece by piece.

Rich Indians convert their wealth into gold, pearls and precious stones. The wearing of jewels is not confined to females or even to the human family. Men wear ropes of pearls and Maharajahs have a head dress made of strings of pearls, ornamented with diamonds, emeralds and rubles.

A rich bridegroom going to be married wears enough jewelry to stock a retail shop in any city in the world.

The camels, elephants and horses have their bridles, harness or saddles are thrown about the necks of the animals. You can scarcely find a bullock hitched to a cart, throughout India unless it has a string of beads of prists to the party of which the pearly of which the pearly of which the pearls of pearls and with precious stones and often strings of precious the pearls and malden hair ferns tied with yellow ribbons.

At the durbar in Delhi in 1903 the "garkwar" of Baroda wore regalia priate to the party, at which three worth fifteen million dollars. This will be worn again next month when King DRESS OF OLD COLD

George IV. is crowned in Delhi.

This wonderful regalia is a head dress, collar and shoulder piece of five hundred diamonds some of them as large as walnuts. The smallest one would be a treasure to any European. On the outside of this diamond collar is a border consisting of three rows of emeralds, graduated in size, the outside row of emeralds each being an inch square.

This regalia has the famous diamond "Star of the Deccan" as its pendant, This same "galkwar" is not limited in his variety or supply of jewels. He has many ropes of perfect pearls—one of four strings platted and each he large as a pea and perfect. He has another strings of pearls each as large as a marble while brooches, necklaces and rings are numbered by the score. He has a necklace of uncut rubies, which has been used for more than a thousand years.
